The North Korean Army General Headquarters has organized a new section called the "Special Operations Headquarters" to control United Nations-held territory through the use of guerrillas. This section operates North Korean party schools for ROK prisoners of war and civilians taken north in the course of the war. The schools are classified according to the geographical areas of the ROK, and ROK personnel are entered in the school corresponding to their domicile in ROK. By this specialized training, the North Korean government expects to increase guerrilla activity in the ROK on the theory that guerrillas returning to their home areas in South Korea will be better able to recruit additional guerrillas from among their neighbors.
